Hiring Manager

Dear Hiring Manager,

I am writing to apply for the Part-Time Executive Operations Coordinator role. The way you described this position — "Here's what I'm trying to accomplish. Figure out what needs to happen and get as far as you can without me." — is exactly how I work every day as an independent contractor. That kind of assignment is not ambiguous to me. It is the most natural format there is.

How I Work

My current freelance practice spans four active clients — callcatchai.online, primelayertrades.com, hereraspreadsheets.com, and kizunaperformance.com — across media, e-commerce, technology, and professional services. Every one of those engagements involves receiving loosely defined objectives, determining what needs to happen, sequencing the work, executing across multiple workstreams, and delivering without needing to be managed through every step. I track open items, follow up with vendors and contractors, do the research, build the deliverable, and close the loop. That is the shape of my work.

Technical Range

I am comfortable across the full stack of modern business tools: Airtable, Excel, Google Sheets, Notion, Zapier, Power Automate, cloud document environments, AI tools (Claude Code, ChatGPT, Cursor), WordPress, Shopify, and any new platform I need to learn for a project. When a client asks me to evaluate a new software tool, coordinate a media project, or organize a set of vendor follow-ups, I figure out what the tool does and get the work done. I do not need someone to document every capability before I can be useful.

Closing Loops

The competency I would most want to highlight for this role is follow-through. I am obsessive about open items. If something is waiting on another party, I note it, I follow up, and I do not let it age silently. That discipline — staying on top of what is pending, moving things forward without being asked — is what makes an operations coordinator genuinely valuable versus someone who just processes what comes to them.

I am excited about the variety and autonomy this role offers. I would welcome the chance to discuss it.

Sincerely,
Alexander Tobin
